Hmmm, let's call this one The Gangs of New York shall we. Although maybe the last volume should have been called The Gangs of New York Part 1 and this one is Part 2. Yeah, I that works for me. In any case, here we have Ash vs. Arthur Part 2 and while there are no unexpected surprises, the way it plays out to the conclusion is satisfactory. The aftermath of the battle is a bit sedate, but it's really more of an interlude, since we all know more gratuitous violence is on the way. The ending of this volume though is one of those end-of-season-cliff-hangers that leaves you gasping and furious that you have to wait all summer to find out what happens. At least I won't have to wait that long. ;)

The previous volume of "Banana Fish" ended in a bit too obvious cliffhanger, and it's a relief to see that obligatory development handled very efficiently in the beginning of volume 9. And then things get interesting.

I like the way Yoshida's writing trending towards a more character-driven approach. They are getting deeper and more interesting in every volume, and big steps are again made in this regard. This volume doesn't form such a coherent whole, but everything it has is good; the character scenes and plot developments alike. I love where Ash ends up this time both mentally and on the plot level.

So, they won't let Ash take a break, huh.
