Sherry says

I chose this book sight unseen from the online library catalog. I thought it would be a book about solar energy. Well, the book is about survival. It covers information I would have never thought of like how to make different kinds of animal traps, the need to learn to tie different kinds of knots and how to make soap. It has a chapter on creating a BOB (Bugging Out Bag) in case there is some kind of disaster. While the book is written in some detail as a "how to" book, if you don't have prerequisite knowledge and skills it can be pretty confusing. What I ended up with is a list of things to explore further and a vague sense of fear/doom. (For example, if there are people out in remote areas putting out dozens of traps....it could be easy to be out hiking and find yourself very hurt. Some useful advice but anyone reading this book would have to take a bunch of courses to learn the things he believes you should know or be an outdoorsy handy person already.

The cover is wonderful. The information is helpful, logical, but very basic.

Great read and very informative. Pretty much everything in the book would work and is practical. I got this as it was not your tired old survival manual with the usual snares and lean to shelter diagrams. It has a section on gardening and permaculture, solar energy as well as many forgotten skills only your great granny knew. America is descending rapidly into a third world state, get this book and educate yourself on how to survive and thrive in it.

I expected more details. Most of the information was quite general, though very entertaining.

An interesting look on how to survive if humanity comes to an end. A lot of tips on gardening and basic survival that is more like on how to survive without the modern amenities. Not much on how to survive a hostile populace though.
